

Distinguished Bioethics Faculty Position

Wake Forest University seeks a distinguished scholar in bioethics to fill a newly-created position at the rank of full professor (with tenure), beginning Fall 2008. The successful candidate will play a leading role in developing an interdisciplinary, campus-wide Bioethics Center of national prominence, and may be considered for directorship of the Center or one of its component programs if interested and qualified. Exceptionally qualified candidates may also be considered for a chair appointment.

Candidates may come from any of the liberal arts, humanities, or sciences. The primary appointment will be in a department relevant to the candidate's discipline within the College of Arts & Sciences. The area of specialization within bioethics is open, though expertise in biotechnology or bioscience issues is especially welcome. This new faculty member will join other bioethics faculty currently in the College and in the Schools of Law and Medicine. Teaching responsibilities will include courses in the home department and in a planned Masters in Bioethics program.

Wake Forest is a private university offering a liberal arts education, professional degrees, and other post-graduate programs. It has about 4300 undergraduate students and 2500 graduate and professional students. Its academic programs are consistently ranked in the top tiers nationally.

Those interested should send a letter of application (addressing both research interests and teaching philosophy) and a full CV (containing names and contact info for 5 references) to: Kathy Bunn, Bioethics Search Committee, Wake Forest University, Box 7866, Winston-Salem, NC 27109-7866. Applications by female and minority candidates are strongly encouraged. Applications will be reviewed starting Nov. 30 and accepted until the position is filled. For additional inquiries, contact Prof. Mark A. Hall, mhall@law.wfu.edu or Prof. Nancy M. P. King, nmpking@wfubmc.edu.